The first thing that struck me was the similarity to mid-town New York, fifth avenue or madison...although looking around I saw some of the old shops which didn’t seem as much fifth or madison avenues as I thought at first....some nice dress shops and some crusty shoemaker and tailor shops down in the basement.

Then I was struck by the standards out in the sidewalk, the clock and the other standard which I thought was rather European in its character.

After that, we started to all down the street and I noticed the shop with the curios, japanese gift items. wanted to go in there. and, looking around and noticing some of the loft shops and loft office areas. We walked a bit further and I was quite surprised at some of the rundown retail shops further down the street and thought that they were in direct contrast to the pretty fashionable high class dress shops on the other side.

I think at that point I noticed the John Hancock somewhere in the block...thought It looked pretty nice with just the tower sticking out, not the whole mass.

Walking further down, the church at the corner, Dr. Greeley’s church. The tower was above all the rest of the street at that point with the common in the backround. I was curious about the use of the office space next to the church which I found out was part of the church.

We reached the corner, and the full effect of the common struck me there. You could see the opening of the park at the right hand side. and we headed down towards the alley on the left. As we passed there I thought the alley was rather run-down and run-down not all that like Beacon Hill alley's.

Then down as far as Newbury and walked down Hugh. Here I was struck by the hotel on the right and the large number of cars on the left in the parking lot, sort of spilled out into the street. There were sales shops on the way...a grocery shop with some sort of fancy flatsware before the parking lot.

Right next to the lot a large rather blank brick wall which served as a sort of visual separation between the Hancock on the left and another church on the right hand side of Newbury. I thought there was an interesting composition there.

I think we also noticed the predominance of attractive blondes on that street.

I noticed some dress shops and took another look at the church on the other side of the street, about half way down...thought that was a rather pleasant building, fairly low and...the stony store...FAO Schwarz toys, which is a sort of attractive thing anywhere in town. Stopped and looked in their window for a while.

We wound darkley again and proceeded to enter the alley. As we walked, I started to get feelin that my first impression would have to be modified. The alley was kind of interesting. We walked back and saw the truck parked right in the middle of the alley with the fashionable dress shop (down 2nd) and behind that the weave of one of the churches...and they just ran behind each other in a symetrical fashion.
in the alley itself there was a sign that I thought was rather humorous... I don't recall right now.

Further down the alley we saw... some question of a candy hanging way up high. I thought that was residential use, but apparently it was an office. Further down we saw the backside of one of the office buildings. I thought it was an interesting treatment architecturally... the building running side by side with a narrow sidewalk... on the right hand side of the alley going down was a small back yard garden composed of one tree.

Further we passed by some workshops in the basement. The real life behind the fancy dress shop on Newbury, and quite a few trash cans and curtains in the alley. I think at that point... several items I can't recall small signs and things...

Then leaving the alley and going across to some houses with some difficulty because of the tremendous amount of traffic in the way and we saw a predominance of young college girls... two of whom sitting in the car.

I kind of like the setting of the common close to the streets as you can see the streets from practically any point we walked on... that was not the case, the Gardens. That part of the street mostly for walking and sitting rather than playing. Water out of season. No street cars in action.

I like the trees there too, some were quite unusual... low tortured shapes.

(buildings) I remember some church spires in the background, not on the street and beyond... one further up on Newbury.

(sidewalk) going down on Boyle's the sidewalk was unusually wide... a real open feeling... on the other side it seemed to be a perfectly normal sidewalk. Nothing particular unusual about sidewalk on Newbury or on streets.

(spaces) in space, with standards. (materials) appeared to be correct.

(pedestrians) I was looking around on Boyle wondering if I would see anything unusual. There were shoppers, people interested in dress shops, and office workers, seemed to be pretty much of a cross section of what I'd expect to find downtown with anyone particular predominating on Boylston. On Newbury, of course, there's a very striking type of women. Hairdressers salon opposite hotel. There a distinct type. Of course the young... college girls at this time of day walking just the Garden. Also saw a man carrying trash cans down Newbury St. Seems a bit incongruous at the time.

(signs) In addition... sign on window of church on Boylston... a religious aspect or something. I did notice that that signs on Newbury [left] pretty subdued... just flat against the wall rather than any neon signs sticking out, that did occur farther down on Newbury when it went into a sort of run of brownstone houses, residential houses. One of which housed an art studio on top as I remember... a good place to live.
(hearing) nothing unusual. What I'd expect to hear downtown in a city.
I guess I'm used to that by now. Sound of cars, buses, trucks, vendors, people walking by...I believe there were some shooting cab drives at one point on Newbury...parking lot attendants moving cars about.

(smells) I had a slight cold...couldn't smell the city.
Although at one point did seem to be a rather heavy smoke or odor.

(areas) They were quite distinct. Boylston St seemed to be...the side we were on was quite different from the side across the st. Not only the shops but physically in terms of space...The predominance of stores shop on one side and other service shops on the other...as we passed down further the Garden was a distinct change down there with the landscape prevailing.
Up Newbury seemed to be overwhelmed by the hotel at one end and the women who use that street for hotel purposes, and the beauty shops and...so that was distinct. Of course the alley's character is similar.

(places) nothing distinct, but Bowditch Teller which is a pleasant sight anywhere.

(character) I feel as if I've hit upon the character of the different parts of the area. I felt there was no overall character to be consistent in the entire area. (in architecture) builds not turned into shops and camera used seemed to have a bronze stone appearance that seems to occur a lot in Boston.
5, or 6 story walk-ups, built probably about 1890. Generally pretty pleasant to look at.

(order) If any Newbury at rather than the others, in that...the non-commercial appearance of it struck me first, but that detracted by parking lot, and brick wall that brought it down...even with hotel and shops. I don't think any one part of it held together as I rather hoped it will. (disorderly?) somewhat in a rather high class way.

(Conception of Boston) It seems to fit in with perhaps a transition from the old Boston to a newer Boston. Walking downtown there's no question about it as being built in about 1890, real old...going up towards John Hancock you get the impression that this is a newer, 20th century Boston...and this area has elements of them both. has many elements. I find it admirable somewhat to parts of midtown New York...as the east side of fifth ave around Madison in the upper forties, except that of course physically it's not really built as high. It has some of a transitional character, but transition to a higher level rather than a lower one. Going from downtown from that which is newer than downtown.

(at ease) Yeah I'm familiar with this part of the city in other cities. A pleasant part of a city. I guess socially it appeals to me, with higher levels of living that could be attractive in a city.
