We are somewhat in doubt about one figure of the Pirie Memorial. Your letter of May twenty-sixth indicates St. James with St. John, but when I was with you some time earlier, St. Matthew was specified as the companion of John. We had pretty well designed this subject before receiving your message, but we can readily change Matthew to James if we should do so.

In the sketch, ^{MATTHEW} holds the evangelistic book and pen while the medallion represents his calling from the receipt of customs. St. John holds his traditional symbol, the chalice from which emerges the dragon, to symbolize the poisoned potion, which he drank without harm. The medallion represents him as an old man on the island of Patmos, recording his apocalyptic vision of the bride,--New Jerusalem, descending from Heaven.

Note: When we set our windows, they would like us to lighten the Fry window, in an attempt to brighten it and bring it into better harmony with ours.
